

I liked the lecture because Randy Paus is so passionate about what he is talking about and him saying he has cancer I think most affected me and drew me in even though he told us not to pity him. And hearing him talk about achieving his dreams as a kid was inspirational.

What he was talking about was true that achieving your dreams is so important and also even doing things you can't achieve is still a good lesson. One of his dreams was to join the NFL and even though he wasn't able to achieve this when he was a kid he gained a lot of lessons from being on a football team like how you shouldn't just focus on one thing and how you should all work as a team. And I agree I think that working on your own goals is good and you definitely should but you also take time to help people with theirs. I think that it is so validating to help another person achieve something they want and then they help you, not only does it build friendship but also a sense of community
